LEAFY SPURGE

Leafy spurge, generally identified as Euphorbia esula L., actually is a complex of biotypes and phenotypes. This plant is a tenacious, poisonous weed infesting nearly  $2\frac{1}{2}$  million acres of rangeland in North America with a conservative 1979 economic impact of 11.2 million dollars. It is distributed throughout the northern hemisphere from an origin in the Caucasus region of Eurasia. Leafy spurge was reported in North America in 1827 and presently is found in the United States in 456 counties located in 20 states and in Canada in all the provinces. About 90% of the leafy spurge problem is concentrated in seven states and four provinces--North Dakota - 600,000 acres; Montana - 543,000 acres; Nebraska - 105,000 acres; South Dakota - 60,000 acres; Minnesota - 800,000 acres; Idaho - 35,000 acres; Wyoming - 36,000 acres; and Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia combined - 100,000 acres.

At present, chemicals are the primary control; however, the few approved herbicides are becoming increasingly expensive, are not as effective as needed, and have environmental limitations. The need to accelerate a regional integrated pest research and management program which would utilize biological and cultural controls in addition to herbicides is apparent. Resolutions supporting such a program were passed in 1979 by the state legislatures of both North Dakota and Montana, as well as the Old West Regional Commission.
